

Since I was a young child, I've always been told, "Every little bit helps." I use this as my motto when I think about things I'm doing to help make a green earth. For instance, I believe that I can pick up other's trash without being asked and place it in the appropriate bin to recycle. I know that this bit of action adds up, especially, when I find plastic bags which are so deadly to sea animals. I bring my lunch to school in a reusable container because I know that plastic and lunch bags are a strain on our earth. The story of the boy with the star fish encourages me to do whatever I can to keep the earth clean. He found thousands of star fish on the beach, and he started placing them back in the ocean. When he was told that his activity was a waste, he responded, "Not to this star fish." This is exactly how I feel whenever I pick up a plastic bottle or aluminum can - it may not seem like much but it matters to our earth. Thank you for listening to me.
